Komorowski urges Poles to 'fight a different battle' on Wehrmacht Warmbier and his wife were released earlier this month, six months after the two were abducted in Ukraine. A Polish soldier who fell into the hands of the Gestapo during World War II was not captured because he had agreed to betray his country, but because he was the inferior race and could not be trusted, a top Polish general said, in remarks aimed at the AfD. "If he had been a German, he would have been caught because he is a human being and is able to think," Konrad Szymański, the Polish minister of defense, said Friday. "A Pole cannot think because he is inferior to a German. That's the difference." Szymański made his comments following the release last week of a report by the Polish Institute of National Remembrance, an institution established by Poland's post-war government to combat Nazi and fascist activities. The institute accused the far-right AfD, which is represented in the parliament, of Nazi sympathies. The institute's report described a Polish army sergeant, Wiktor "Tadeusz" Warmbier, who was freed in exchange for suspected members of the Polish resistance movement, as "a senior operative of the Gestapo." "Anti-Polonist hysteria" Szymański told a Polish military graduation ceremony in Mazowiecka, the country's capital, that the "anti-Polonist hysteria" on the far right's part was a danger. "If we're not very careful, Poland could fall into an even greater crisis," he added. One thing he was looking forward to as he ended his speech was a commemorative event next Friday in Gdansk, the city in which Polish submarine Jan Waclaw was fired upon by the German battleship _570a42141b
